New Course Descriptions:

CUR 526 -- Environmental Education Online Course

This course is designed to provide students with the basic knowledge and skills needed to integrate Environmental Education into their own teaching. Participants of this course will examine the historical, philosophical, curricular and instructional issues surrounding EE, and they will be challenged to survey their current practice and consider less traditional methods supported by curricula such as Project Learning Tree, Project Wet or Project WILD. The North American Association for Environmental Education (NAAEE) and the Maryland Association of Environmental and Outdoor Education (MAEOE) will provide the standards from which most discussions will take place. A required field experience at NorthBay Adventure Camp in Cecil County will provide modeling and hands-on experience. An additional self-selected field experience (at student's convenience) will be required. Other than the two field experiences, the class will meet online.

Note: Will satisfy as an elective in the Curriculum & Instruction Masters (General Pedagogy track)

CUR 527 – Language, Literacy, and Culture Online Course

Pre-requisite: EDU 550

This course is intended to provide a forum for educators to explore issues relating to how students' individual cultures as well as school culture shapes and is shaped by pedagogical practices, with a focus on literacy and language learning. Areas of concentration will be: oral language learning and use, literacy acquisition, second language learning, literacy and the community, and literacy and new technologies. These topics will be examined through a socio-cultural theoretical lens, in that culture is central to the understanding of language and literacy development. Students will examine the historical, philosophical, and theoretical foundations of multilingual/multicultural learning and teaching, and explore ways educators can support the language and literacy growth of all learners in a diverse society. An emphasis will be placed on the transformative functions of language and literacy, the view that they can effect social change and create more inclusive, democratic societies.

Students will complete an investigative project in which they research an educational problem related to language, literacy and culture, and create a proposal for improvement in their educational setting.

Note: Will satisfy as an elective in the Curriculum & Instruction Masters (General Pedagogy track)

CUR 556 – Introduction to Capstone Experience (.5 credit)

This course is the first in a series of three 0.5 credit courses intended to prepare Curriculum and Instruction candidates for the capstone experience, which is the final requirement for graduation. Candidates will be introduced to the three capstone options: Portfolio Experience, Synthesis Experience, and Action Research Experience. Candidates must take this course during the semester of their second or third course in the program. This course is a requirement for full acceptance into the Curriculum and Instruction Program.
